

Somewhere...

deep below the restless subduction zone at the eastern edge of Puget Sound, in the shadow of the volcanic Cascade Range, there exists hidden beneath a slippery zone of Lawton clay a hatchway hewn from the ancient timbers of the now threatened Whitebark Pine.

As truth became legend, and legend became myth, the stories of what lay hidden for nearly a century remained unchanged. The stoic, unbending believers of these tales—scholars, philosophers and kings—are now, finally, being rewarded for their resolute and steadfast faith in the veracity of what lies beneath.

Using techniques first described by Muckleshoot tribal elders at a potlatch nearly 100 years ago, stout-hearted adventurers and treasure seekers recently uncovered evidence of a vast network of tunnels and caverns behind this portal, hundreds of meters below a farmer's field. At long last, the gateway to the catacombs has been breached to reveal...
